Parsippany zoning battle heads to court

Wildlife group: Town positioning for land-grab

By William Westhoven

A long-simmering battle between Parsippany and its largest landholder is heading to court as the nonprofit group Wildlife Preserves filed suit last month to void the council's rezoning of certain lots on its property.

The majority of the 1,375 privately-owned acres on the preserve, in an area known as Troy Meadows, are wetlands, flood plains and environmentally-sensitive areas the group has preserved for decades. Other upland portions of the property — including lots it owns between Marcia Terrace and Bennett Court in the South Beverwyck section of the township — were approved earlier this year as a subdivision and became fully developable as residential lots.

Len Fariello, former mayor of neighboring Hanover and land manager for Wildlife Preserves, says the township council's recent approval of an ordinance rezoning those lots to a recreation, conservation and wildlife zone was a deliberate attempt to devalue the land "so the township can acquire the land in fee or restrict the land by easement without fair and just compensation."

"The RCW zone devalues the land and makes it easier for government and utilities to take it by eminent domain," Fariello said after the council passed Ordinance 2014:16 during a special meeting on June 2. "The zone couldn't have come at a

"The new zone makes it cheaper and easier to run the lines through the meadows."

If it wasn't for his older brother Luke, Mount Olive graduate Zack Heeman wouldn't have become the athlete he is today.

Zack Heeman is gearing up for his freshman year at Rutgers University and is trying to earn a starting spot on the football team's offensive line as the Scarlet Knights prepare for their first season in the Big Ten.
