would have ricocheted off the tarmac and landed God knows where.

It was a moment that would stay with Lambros, now a retired 75-year-old English teacher. After serving his entire military stint — October 1958 to February 1962 — at that local Nike base, he returned to his native Baltimore area, where he still lives.

All his life, Lambros has contemplated the effects that modern war and weaponry have had, and could have, on all life on the planet. His new novel, "To End All War," is set amid the turmoil of World War I, a war that in many ways, he said, set the stage for today's problems.

Cold War revisited

Through the release of his book, Lambros is lending his voice to a resurgence of interest in the volatility of weapons now and the early days of the Cold War. In some ways, though, the interest is new and fueled by many factors, not the least of which is current events.

When Lambros was working on the Morris missile base, the Nike program, named after the Greek goddess of victory, was in full swing across the nation. The Continental United States, or CONUS, Air Defense System included 15 surface-to-air missile sites in northern and southern New Jersey and many more nationally.

According to "Hidden History of New Jersey at War," another new book, the Nike program was designed to protect major American cities from an air attack by the Soviet Union's Tu-95, a long-range bomber capable of flying 6,000 miles without refueling.

The site where Lambros was stationed was called Nike Battery NY-79/80 because its goal was to defend New York City.

These days, there is concern about Russia as the current crisis in Ukraine drives a rift between that country and the West, and as President Obama considers providing defensive weapons to Ukraine in its conflict with pro-Russian rebels.

Terrorism is another issue that pervades the cultural consciousness now, Lambros said.

"With the power of those JATOs on the missile that day in 1961, it could have come off the tarmac and landed in the middle of Livingston," Lambros explained. "It was a live warhead. You just don't know what that missile could have done."

"With all four boosters operating," he added, "the missile had a range of about 225 miles, so that would include Trenton and Philadelphia, probably Baltimore, and maybe as far as Washington, D.C."

Today he wonders what ISIS, the jihadist terror group, could do even with nuclear waste material.

"I'm not against nuclear missiles," he said. "I understand why they're needed, but I also understand the possibilities, and I don't like them at all. If they were to be employed in a war, they would literally wipe out this earth."

The cultural conversation on the topic has opened in yet another way.

In his new high-profile new book, "Command and Control: Nuclear Weapons, the Damascus Accident, and the Illusion of Safety," Journalist Eric Schlosser uses recently declassified documents and interviews to explore how often the U.S. has come close to a detonating a weapon domestically or accidentally starting a war.

"I wanted three characters because I wanted to make sure I described the war in all three aspects — on the sea, on land and in the air," Lambros said. "I accomplished that with the three characters, two of whom are brothers, and their younger sister."

Literally, the story line fell into his lap. An antique book collector, he once bought "Now It Can Be Told," a World War I book written shortly after the war ended. When he opened its pages, a letter written in 1918 and signed by "Monroe," the chauffeur for three children, fell out. He was intrigued by its contents. In his mind, the story grew.

World War I, Lambros holds, was the first war of its type: It involved the world. Also, its weapons were the basis for modern weaponry and the means to deliver them.

Though the U.S. entered the war late, he added, the casualty and death rate of American troops was unprecedented. According to the U.S. Department of Justice, 204,000 were wounded and 116,500 died.

"That's a ratio, in wartime, that exceeds any norm in modern war," Lambros explained. "We were in the Vietnam War eight years and had half the deaths."

Because of World War I, he added, monarchies in the Austrian, German, and Russian empires were eliminated; Communism was born; and the Middle East was split up without regard to religion or tribal concerns.

Lambros said that in writing and talking about war, he hopes to encourage people to expand and deepen their knowledge of history and their understanding of the forces at work in the world. It's been that way for him since the summer of 1961.

"I'm the kind of guy," he said, "who looks before he leaps."
